Andrii Dovhaniuk is a John S. McCain Strategic Defense Fellow supporting the Office of the Secretary of War for Comptroller. With background in data science, statistics, and machine learning he is passionate about applying analytical solutions and emerging technologies to support national defense and improve operational effectiveness across the Department of War. Through the McCain Fellowship Program, Andrii hopes to improve his leadership, policy, and financial management expertise while building a long-term career in federal service. Prior to joining the Fellowship Program, Andrii conducted research and data science work at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and NASA’s Jet Propulsion Laboratory, where he developed predictive models using large-scale biomedical and satellite imaging datasets. He also supported AI and analytics initiatives for the Maryland Prescription Drug Affordability Board. Through these experiences, he developed a strong interest in using data, advancing technologies, and strategic analysis to support complex challenges in the public sector. Outside of work, Andrii enjoys hiking, working out, cars, and long-distance road trips.
